IN January 2017, Alice Boggis-Rolfe (b.1990) set out on a journey across Africa, Asia, South and Central America. She deliberately chose seven countries that contrasted starkly with the British and European landscapes she has become known for, and with each other. The paintings in this exhibition convey a sense of the places and people she encountered on this journey.

The majority of the pictures in this exhibition were painted from life on small pieces of canvas, reflecting the realities of travelling long distances over difficult terrain whilst carrying equipment. Alice paints at considerable speed, enabling her to capture the essence of a place and the changes it undergoes over a short period. In Sri Lanka, she raced to complete a hill scene before a storm rolled in, as the leaden weight of the sky and the tea plantations awaited a deluge. On a hectic street corner in Kathmandu she brought to life the peculiar beauty of flaking paint and wet pavements amidst the chaos of bustling crowds.

During her journey, Alice's work was strongly influenced by the people she met, who caused her to venture away from her focus on landscapes into the realms of portraiture. In the small village of Ta Phin in Northern Vietnam, she met and painted tribal women who had made every stitch of their clothes and even the lurid dyes which coloured them. In a remote Andean village in Peru, she encountered a young girl of five who had to return home before long to prepare supper for her family. Some of these people now feature in her pictures.

Whilst she was unable to speak the language of many of these people, Alice found herself able to communicate with them through her pictures. At times, such as in a market off the tourist trail in Cusco, her presence was greeted initially with suspicion, which quickly gave way to excitement and uproarious amusement at the addition of any detail to the scene. Seeing her painting early one morning in Trinidad, an elderly Cuban man, delighted by watching her work, serenaded her as 'La Pintora Inglesa'.

Since returning to London, Alice has spent many hours in the studio. Drawing on the works created from life, she has produced a series of larger paintings which are at the heart of this, her second solo exhibition (following a near sell-out first show in 2015).

Alice is already planning her next adventure for 2018.

I have been living and working in South America since 2005. My travel company, Plan South America, was born of a passion for Argentina, which developed into a continent-wide fascination. Based in London and Buenos Aires, our team of specialists craft one-of-a-kind adventures to some of the most remote and spectacular corners of South America and Antarctica.

We lay on the best dove shooting in Cordoba and show you to that secluded little river in deepest Chilean Patagonia; access to private gardens and art collections; gaucho riding holidays and Andean wine tours; sybaritic beach houses on Brazil's Bahian coast, expeditions to emerald mines in Colombia and puma tracking and birding in its Sierra Nevada de Santa Marta; artist and writer retreats deep in the Argentine pampas; volcano heli-skiing; hot air balloons and dune buggies in the Atacama Desert... peppered, of course, with all the fabulously inspiring local characters you would hope to meet on such a journey.
